Harvard's rise came from fewer speech controversy penalties and a "high honors" bonus after President Garber publicly denied federal orders to derecognize student groups. He stated, "Freedom of thought and inquiry...has enabled universities to contribute in vital ways to a free society and to healthier, more prosperous lives."

Harvard ranks in the bottom 25 for "Comfort Expressing Ideas" and "Administrative Support," suggesting students feel uneasy voicing opinions and doubt administrative backing.

Harvard can improve by revising its speech policies to earn a "green light" Spotlight rating and formally committing to open inquiry by adopting the Chicago Statement. But policy changes alone won't rebuild trust. The university must defend student and faculty expression during controversy, clearly communicate the value of free speech, and embed expressive rights training into first-year orientation. Given its outsized influence in higher education, Harvard must demonstrate not only strong policies but a genuine, consistent commitment to free expression through its actions.
